

Learn how to taste from Len

1 Sep 2007 by JR

A little gem of a book, Len Evans – How to taste wine, has just been published in Australia and can be ordered from anywhere in the world.

Evans had just finished work on this practical guide and collection of reminiscences from his 40 years as a wine judge, many of them as Australia's pre-eminent exponent of the noble beverage, when he died suddenly just over a year ago (see obituary). Anyone who knew him, or one of the many hundreds of thousands who was dazzled and/or benefited by him from stage, lecture or head table, will enjoy this unadorned dose of his expertise, experience and conviction. He wrote as he spoke, although we are now also deprived of his immaculate comic timing.

This thoroughly attractive book has been put together with the help of his friends James Hildray and Hugh Johnson and some clever design, including a wonderfully accurate line drawing of the profile by the artist Fred Williams who designed The Rotbury Estate blends during Len's tenure and who, according to Len's daughter Sally, "was also Irish and looked very similar to Dad (and very much like me)".

Of its 112 pages, some of my favourites describe dinners: one in Bordeaux to honour André Tchelistcheff, another in Sydney to honour Michael Broadbent at which the late Andrew Oubick, an Evans protégé, pretended to have dropped the Rieselheimer Apollonien 1727 (his 75th birthday celebration in the Hunter Valley in 2005 at which no fewer than 14 1924s were served, including two first growths and a magnum of Bonville Cuvée 1926), and his casual reference to drinking Lufta 1985 twice, once in bottle (in 1982) and once in double magnum if you please (in 2005).

This is his recipe for successful tasting: "read as much as possible, go to as many tastings as you are able, attend dinners, listen to advice, try to be in the company of those who can impart some wisdom and knowledge." Of these five practices, I only ever see him indulge in two.

Len Evans – How to taste wine, published by Bantam Books Publishing of Sydney, has a retail price of AUD$19.95 within Australia but can be ordered, quantity discounts applying, from:

Evans Family Wines

Becke Road

Paddington

NSW 2020

Australia

Tel +61 (0)2 458 7237

jrobin@jancisrobinson.com.au

www.evansfamilywines.com.au

Email to enquire about postage and packing costs to destinations outside Australia.