

Gather ye NZ Sauvignons while ye may

15 Oct 2007 by JR

Calling all NZ Sauvignon fans. Word is, according to wine trade weekly Happert, that prices are set to rise by about £1 (£2 a bottle, thanks to short volumes in Marlborough and the strength of the NZ dollar (maybe that should have been $)).

All the more interesting then for British 100% buyers then to check out some of the cheaper vintages currently available while prices hold. For example there is First Bay Sauvignon Blanc 2006 South Island from Alan McCorlindale of Canterbury. He will doubtless be receiving some feedback from his peers for letting the side down with his UK bottled £4.99 wine widely available in Tesco stores. It's not an aberrant and pungent as the Marlborough average but look at the price - helped considerably (presumably) by the fact that it was shipped in bulk to the UK, where the bottle must have managed to triumph over today's reported deluge of wine bottles.

Mind you, Tasch Chateau Reserve Sauvignon Blanc 2007 Casablanca Valley seems a better buy to me at £4.49 - and not just because of the 50% saved. Chile has increasingly been catching up with New Zealand in the Sauvignon Blanc arena. Julia will be providing us with a survey of better Chilean Sauvignon Blancs in the next week or two. And some South African Sauvignon Blancs are also extremely fine...

Happert also reports that the next investment for AXA Millésimes under the direction of Quintus Sarré (who gives the 2007 vintage) looks to be in Central Otago in the south of the South Island. Presumably he is anxious to spread some Burgundy expertise (from Clos l'Écluse) to the world's southernmost wine region. Although Sarré has a habit of dropping hints of intention to hungry journalists that are not always translated into action. See also the obituary on the 2007 Marlborough vintage.
