

Chianti Classico - thoroughly red now

1 Jul 2008 by FT but this is a much longer version

The 2005 vintage of Chianti Classico brings us wine lovers something to celebrate – and not just that so many of the wines taste good. This is the first year that white wine grapes have been outlawed from this, the quintessential wine of Tuscany: the land of olive, wine, cypress and, at the time of year, thousands of holiday-makers.

Putting white wine grapes in red wine is not quite as bizarre as it sounds. In some cases there are sound reasons for including a few green-skinned grapes along with the purple. In Cote Rôtie in the Rhône Valley for instance there is a long-standing tradition of co-fermenting a small proportion of pink Vignoles grapes with the Syrah to make the wine taste smoother and stabilise the pigment of the red Syrah grapes. Copies of this recipe were all the rage in Australia a few years ago and Chateau Ygrec has become a staple offering them.

But the white grapes that once routinely diluted Chianti, including that from its heartland Chianti Classico between Florence and Siena, were there for a much less noble reason than Vignoles is to be found in Marek Guzger's seductive La Moutrie, my favourite Cote Rôtie. The requirement that Chianti contain between 10 and 30 per cent of white grapes was written into the original 1987 DOC (Italy's answer to Appellation Contrôlée) regulations for the entirely expedient reason that it provided a convenient use for the substantial proportion of pink-skinned grapes then planted in the zone. Some of them were Malvasia, an ancient Greek variety with red character that is today used to make Vin Santo, Tuscany's sweet wine treasure. But the great majority of white wine grapes that used to go into Chianti, blending to colour and diluting its flavour, were the most basic sort of Tardivo whose wine is generally now flavoured and best distilled, as it is in France's Cognac district where it is known as Ugni Blanc.

In the 1970s and 1980s Chianti was typically a red, but, only just red wine. The fury of plantings of the main red wine grape Sangiovese that followed Chianti's accession to DOC status were mainly of poor quality clones, selected for quantity not quality, and the substantial proportion of white grapes that had to go into every early-encompassed Chianti's poor reputation. Things improved a little however in 1984 when Chianti Classico was promoted from DOC status to DOCG. The white grape requirement was reduced to two to six per cent.

In the late 20th century the most glamorous fashionable grape varieties in Tuscany, and much of Italy, were imports from France: Cabernet Sauvignon, Merlot, sometimes Syrah. Ambitious Tuscan growers made haste to plant these so that they could make their own versions of the so-called Superstars, reds that were not encumbered by the stuffy old DOC regulations requiring precise proportions of white grapes with the traditional Sangiovese backbone and such other local red grapes as Canalicchio and Corvina. These Superstars, made in the image of the super-successful Bordeaux, a sort of clone from the Tuscan coast, were put on the market at prices wildly more than long-ago Chianti Classico. In some of the better cases, these Superstars based at least on French oak barrels had been an even more important ingredient in them than the grapes, fellow wine-makers and their many fans seemed to have all but forgotten Sangiovese, Tuscany's signature indigenous wine variety.

But since the mid-1990s the tide has been turning. Thanks to much more careful selection of Sangiovese plant material, much more skilled viticulture and in some cases a return to the large, well-assessed estates in which Chianti was traditionally and more subtly measured, the quality of Chianti Classico has soared.

In line with the worldwide trend towards revaluing the local rather than the imported, particularly so for so food and drink are concerned, Chianti is once more enjoying the spotlight of fashion. Initially it was the special late bottlings, the Riservas, that received the most rapturous attention but now many of the regular bottlings, of which 2006 is the latest vintage on the market, are highly recommendable wines. The 2004 vintage was also very good but the very 2005 was so. Even better, some of the delicious 2006s I tasted recently in a line-up of 20 or so red for under £10/£20 a bottle. Riservas may be for drinking at between five and 10 years old but most regular Chianti Classico is delightful at two to four years old and the best wines labelled simply Chianti can provide lively, healthy, simple drinking even younger than this.

One of Chianti's great attributes is how very digestible it can be, apparently created for the table. It complements rather than obscures food. Chianti may occasionally be called the Bordeaux of Italy but the structure of the wines is very different from any French wine. Polish and country play little part in Chianti's appeal. A good Chianti is very definitely an agricultural product. It suggests terraced, sometimes even a hillside. There's a hint of autumn much or sometimes pines, and there should always be some distinctively tangy freshness and bite – even a slight but appealing bitterness.

The modern lawmakers, those who have at last outlawed white grapes from Chianti, must now be congratulating themselves that they retained the option of allowing a small proportion of non-traditional red grapes to be blended with Sangiovese and other local varieties. (I found that several of the wines I had been to my recent tasting of current Chianti Classico contained about five per cent of the fleshy Merlot grape, arguably a better complement to Sangiovese's muscular frame than Cabernet.)

Just down the road in Montalcino, where one of Italy's most famous wines Brunello is supposed to be made of nothing but the local Sangiovese, all hell has broken loose after a patch on the varietal make-up of various famous wines, presumed to be politically inspired. The wines, variously called Brunello Rosso or Brunello Rosso, has been running on since it broke, for maximum effect, on the eve of Italy's annual Verona wine fair, Vinitaly, in April. The charge is that some of the most successful Brunellos in fact contain imported grape varieties. The authorities in the US, the leading export market for Brunellos, and most Italian wines, threatened to ban all imports of Brunello unless accompanied by a sophisticated laboratory analysis proving that they contain nothing but Sangiovese (or if the average consumer cares). The official American demand has since been modified to the requirement of a certificate assuring Sangiovese integrity. I think most producers could manage one of those, don't you?

In Montalcino itself there is blood on the carpet, heads have rolled, the press have had a field day and any number of clichés you care to mention apply. Montalcino's normally languorous atmosphere has been poisoned by the highly unsatisfactory and arguably unnecessary witch hunt.

For the moment, the sun shines on Chianti.

CHIANTI CLASSICO WORTH BUYING

deserves a particularly traditional, lively style deserves especially good value

RECOMMENDED 2006

*Bella e Contorno

*Cayanne

Ferrocant

*Cofanage

Montecchi

Principe Conti, La Corte

San Felice Calcinaia

*Vila Calcinaia

SUPERIOR 2005

*Castello di Ama

*Castello di Meleto

*Cassinese di Viticcio

*Fornelli

A GOOD VALLE 2004

*El Poggio

See also my article here on a range of Chianti Classics from which these recommendations were drawn. See www.jancisrobinson.com for details.