

Friuli

5 Sep 2008 by Jancis Robinson

By a substaff: Fine, aromatic varieties.

Main grapes: All the universals plus Friulano, Picolit, Ribolla, Verduzzo (white) and Refosco (red).

Friuli, or Friuli-Venezia Giulia to give the curious north-east corner of Italy its full name, is overlooked by many Italian wine lovers. Its popularity fluctuates wildly but the 'green is always greener' rule holds as firmly in the world of wine as elsewhere. Basically, every nation of wine consumers treasures more what it finds most difficult to produce. In Germany, for example, the homeland of light, aromatic whites, it is full-bodied, deep-coloured reds that are in greatest demand. But because Friuli is the only part of Italy in which light, aromatic whites have been produced with ease (thanks largely to the easy introduction of refrigerated ways of getting pure, fresh, vinified fruit into a bottle), Italian connoisseurs have been prepared to pay well over the odds for them.

In a way Friuli wines are foreign to Italians. They are a product instead of a fully no man's land between the Venetians, Slovenians and southern Austrians and they taste like it. This is the land of the varietal, wine made principally to express the full of the grape variety specified on the label. As of 17 different varieties are allowed within the scope of Friuli's two most respected DOCs, Collio (officially Collio Goriziano e Collico) and Colli Orientali del Friuli (which means 'eastern hills of Friuli'). Of these the most common are Friulano (the Hungarian successfully adapted to the prefix Traminer), Pinot Grigio (Pinot Gris), Sauvignon Blanc, Pinot Bianco (Pinot Blanc), Merlot (which sometimes turns out to be the old Bordeaux variety Merlot).

A local golden specialty of the Colli Orientali, once fashionable and still too expensive, made from dried grapes. Chardonnay and Cabernet Franc/Frank but local specialties include Ribolla Gialla, Verduzzo and the always expensive Picolit for white wines and the long Refosco and rare Schoppetino and Pignolo for the red wines of Colli Orientali, which are becoming increasingly accomplished. In general the best red wines come from the south western corner of the Colli Orientali, most of which is almost alpine, being effectively the foothills of the Dolomites. (Quite) sweet white Picolit is Collio is almost indistinguishable from that part of Slovenia just over the hills of Gorizia on its northern border, and there is no shortage of fine, increasingly fruity and interesting white wine made here. Traminer, Malvasia and Pinningo (Weissteinling rather than the classic Riesling of Germany which is known in Italy as Pinningo) are all grown here.

Now that Italian winemakers south and west of Friuli have also mastered the art of making fresh, truly white wines, however, particularly those of Alto Adige, their counterparts in Collio and Colli Orientali are having to try harder to justify their price premium, typically but not necessarily with greater use of small oak barrels. The standard of winemaking here is generally very high, and yields relatively low, even if the price for this is that the wines can taste remarkably similar. Some of the producers most revered within Italy are Borgo Convent, Borgo del Tiglio, Giacomo Donga, Fajolo, Livio Faluga, Gramer, Jermann, Marz, Puzos, Radikon, Ronchi di Collio, Ronco del Cavall, Schioppetto, Tencin, and Villa Russiz whose wines can continue to develop in bottle for three to five years.

Granger and Radikon are leading a movement towards extended skin contact in white winemaking and even aging the wines in amphorae rather than barrels, resulting in particularly distinctive, long-lived wines that may be an acquired taste.

Other important DOC zones such as Sardegna (to the south and subject to more assertive influences from the Adriatic) and, especially, the prolific Grave del Friuli are on better land and tend to produce much less impressively opaque than the Friulano. Nevertheless, producers such as La Nave, Pignat, Pison, Val Romana and Viozza show just what can be done with the best sites in this part of the world.

The less well-known DOCs to the south are Piano, Lison-Frascozzone, Friuli-Aquileo and Carno and there are some good wines to be found in all of them.